Market Outlook and Investment Strategy

The world economy remained lackluster, except that US keeps reporting healthy growth on domestic consumption and house market. We expect that US Fed will finally hike the interest rate by the end of this year; but the side-effects have been largely absorbed and priced-in for the emerging markets. We expect that the commodity prices will remain low given the sluggish demands; and deflation pressure is the top threat for the world economy.

For the past several years aftermath the world financial crisis, China's economy entered into a prolonged transition period. The old economic drivers (export and infrastructure) had lost steam, but the new drivers (domestic consumption and advanced manufacturing) are yet to be strong enough to bolster the nation's further growth. We expect that China's GDP growth and CPI will remain low for the rest of the year and probably in year 2016. China's central government is striking to bolster the growth with sustainable expanded fiscal policies and loosening monetary policies. We also expect the new-round SOE reform will rejuvenate the big SOEs again.
