Market Outlook and Investment Strategy

Stock markets worldwide were hit hard on 24 June by the unexpected Brexit vote result, which was widely dubbed a "black swan" event. It may be the beginning of the end of a united Europe and globalization as a whole, or it may just be a speed bump in a long journey. While markets reacted instantly in an initial spark, the economic and political impact on Europe should be more of a slow burn rather than a blazing inferno; the effects of the outcome will not be fully felt for years to come. As a result, it's widely expected that Federal Reserve won't make any further hike this year. Gold price and high-rating government bonds soared. The global market is still in the risk-off mode.

China macro figures were still lackluster for May. China's economic policy to further stimulate the economy was to emphasis more on the fiscal expanding policies. M2 growth and aggregating financing balance continued shrinking in May, which were 11.8% and 660 billion respectively. The initial effects of supply-side reform on redundant capacity emerged, as the coal production in China shrank by 8.4% YTD. We also expect that the SOE reform will be the focus for the central government in 2H2016.
