Market Outlook and Investment Strategy

U.S. reported mixed macro figures as the non-farm payroll number was weak than expected. The market took this as the supportive sign for deferring of interest rate hike from U.S. Fed, and the global market got another round of relief rally. USD remained relatively strong at high level, while the commodity prices were volatile.

The rather weak industrial production growth and FAI YTD growth suggested that China's government needs to roll out more fiscal stimulus to bolster the economy. We expect to see further fiscal expanding in 2H 2016, while the monetary policy may not have much room for further loosening. The RMB remained stable during the G20 meeting, and we expect the RMB will remain relatively stable for the rest of year. We turned relatively optimistic for both A-share market and Hong Kong market, given the still amiable monetary environment.
