Market Outlook and Investment Strategy

The global economy is still lacking of concrete signals for recovery despite that the major central banks have practiced excess easing policies for years. As ECB and BOJ have gradually reached the ceiling for further QE plans, and U.S. Fed is planning for another interest rate hike by the end of this year; the possible tapering of easing policies may arouse huge volatility in global markets.

We become more optimistic on China's economy in 2H2016. As we have expected in our previous review, the macro figures of China showed preliminary recovery since August. The power consumption growth accelerated to 8% along with industrial production growth picking up from the trough. The leading indicator, PPI, continued improving since the beginning for year 2016; and we expect PPI will come back to positive territory before year-end. The central government's supply-side reform on over-capacity industries showed positive effects; and the SOE reform will help to restructure the gigantic SOEs in order to bolster further sustainable growth.
