Market Outlook and Investment Strategy

ECB and BOJ's no further easing were interpreted by the market as tapering. The bond yields increased and the volatility hiked across the global market. As the US election getting more uncertain for the result pending on November 8th, we expect even bigger volatility in the short term. Meanwhile, the inflation shows very early sign in US, which will also help to bolster the expectation for further interest rate hike.

China reported decent 3Q16 results. GDP growth remained stable at 6.7% as expected, and the PPI growth returned back to positive territory. We still remain relatively optimistic for domestic A-share market as China's economy finally stabilized. We expect the central government will further strengthen the fiscal stimulus while remains relatively neutral on interest rate. We are more cautious for Hong Kong market, as the recent weak US dollar will impact investors' interest in Hong Kong.

Specifically, we would like to highlight the investment opportunity in short term: raw materials. Given the rising expectation for possible inflation in China (CPI was 1.9% in September) and the central government's stimulus on FAI, we would like to suggest picking up some leading players in materials, such as aluminum and coal.
