Market Outlook and Investment Strategy

We expect to see increasing volatility in global markets. Even though the US market quickly recovered from the unexpected shock of US president election result; the bond yield inevitably hiked up due to the rising concern of inflation. OPEC reached agreement for oil production cut starting from next January 2017, which came as another surprise to the global market. We still expect strong USD will persistent along with volatile material prices.

China's latest macro figures were still encouraging. The PPI growth accelerated and the latest PMI figures reached high in recent months. Money supply remained relatively amiable despite that the long-term bond yield hiked up as PBOC deliberately steepened the yield curve. We still see ample room for China's central government to expand fiscal stimulus in next year. We expect China will set similar growth target (GDP growth at 6.5%) for year 2017 upon the Party's coming central economic work conference.
