Market Outlook and Investment

US Fed finally hiked the interest rate as expected. But the hawkish outlook for tapering in 2H17 came as a surprise. Euro Zone showed positive signs of recovery, and the ECB also indicated hawkish action such as tapering is ready to further strengthen the growth momentum. Oil price tumbled due to oversupply, but the commodity prices remained volatile.

China reported solid and inline macro figures in May. Industrial production growth remained solid (+6.5%), while the export growth recorded at 8.7%. The market is well expected inline GDP growth at 6.7% for the 2Q17. The Inclusion of A-share to MSCI indices was a positive catalyst for A-share market. As the mid-year ending was approaching, the PBOC also relatively eased by injecting funds into the market to avoid the stringent liquidity collapse, which happened in 1H2013. We expect that the relative stringent monetary policies will last till the 3Q17, when bolstering growth will become the priority of the central government again.

In regard to our investment strategy, we turned relatively more optimistic on domestic A-share market. The valuation for blue chips remains attractive, while the profitability improved gradually thanks to the recovering external demand; as well as the stimulus policies from the governments (supply-side reform). We suggest tilting in the A-share ETF to engage more exposure on domestic stock market. We also continue tilting in the domestic consumption sector; in order to catch the opportunity on sustainable growth of the sector.
